Bartje

"When people think of Drenthe, they think of dolmens, the beautiful forests, nature, and... Bartje.
In 1935, Anne de Vries wrote the children's book Bartje. It was about a boy growing up in a large, poor family. His father was a laborer and didn't earn much. The family often ate brown beans because they were cheap. In the most famous scene from the book, the family sat down at the table. Brown beans were on the menu again. Before eating, they had to say grace. But Bartje didn't want to thank God for the brown beans, because he didn't like them. He said: 'I don't pray for brown beans.'"

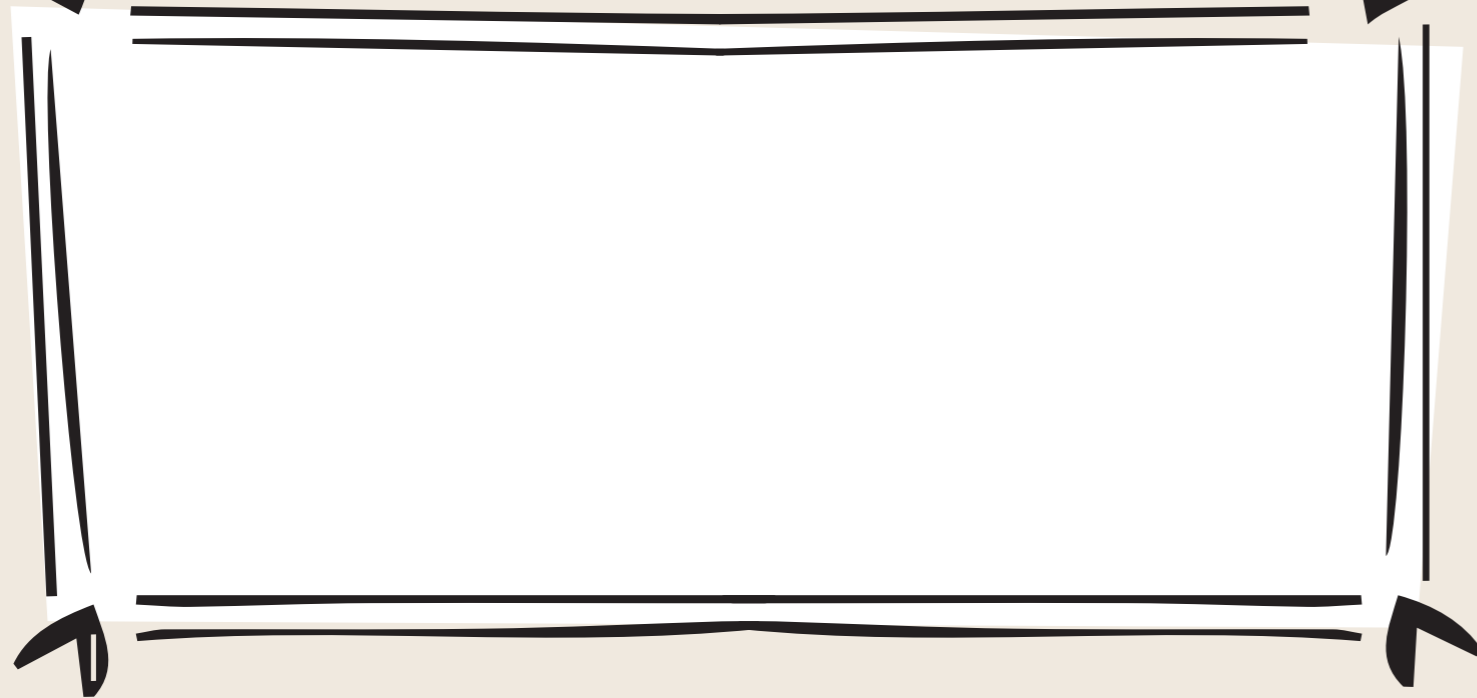

Bartje on TV

In 1972, a television series was made about Bartje. The series was filmed in Drenthe. This way, all of the Netherlands got to know Bartje and Drenthe. Because the series is spoken in the dialect of Drenthe, everyone in the Netherlands was introduced to the regional language. In 1954, a statue of Bartje was unveiled. It was a stone statue that was later destroyed by vandals. Afterward, a bronze statue was made, which has been securely fastened. You can see the statue of Bartje in Assen, behind the Drents Museum.
